It's a difficult thing to say this is a great film that I enjoyed. I can only say this: it was a film that I appreciated. I appreciated the care taken to create it in a way that was not exploitative, but informational. It not only explored the murder and the seven-year marriage of OJ and Nicole, the producers also included discussions with Nicole's therapist, Susan Forward, who explains the proclivities of this sort of relationship, that it is mutually obsessive and a difficult cycle to break.

It also includes dialogue from Nicole's sister, Tanya, and not a vitriolic rampage. She talks about the deep love OJ and Nicole had for one another and the wonderful relationship they all shared. She speaks of missing her sister's humor and warmth, talking to her on the telephone. She shares that on the same day of the murders Nicole had said to her mother that OJ was her soulmate, and always will be. She doesn't focus on bitterness towards OJ, she focuses instead on all of the wonderful memories she has of her sister.

The series Final 24 released by MVD Entertainment Group is part documentary and part biography. It examines the lives of the famous dead, looking for the clues, the harbingers, of what was to come. By examining the past, and re-creating the events that occurred on the day they died, producer Nick Godwin is able to capture, through reflection, the tragic end that was always rushing towards them like a head-on train.

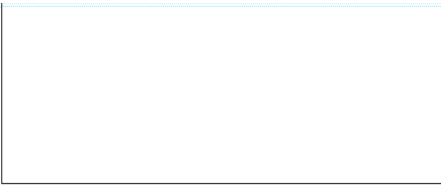

Nicole Brown Simpson: Her Final Hours features commentary from Nicole's friends David Lebon and Ron Hardy as well as sports journalist Art Spander and homicide detective Tom Lange. Together they tell the life stories of Nicole and OJ, both together and apart, the events that led up to the tragic night of her death, and what has now become of the infamous home at 875 S. Bundy Drive in Brentwood, California.
